

GYLA assesses the election of judicial members of the High Council of Justice as an intraclan rotation

The main challenge for the judiciary today is clan governance and its alliance with the authorities. An influential group of judges has effective leverage to influence important decisions related to the judiciary. [1] The main pillar of the clan is the High Council of Justice, which makes major decisions related to the judiciary. A sitting of the Extraordinary Conference of Judges was scheduled for May 26, 2021, [2] at which four judicial members of the Council are to be elected. [3] Observations of this process over the years show that it takes place mainly in a non-competitive environment, and the Council usually has an intake of the leaders of an influential group of judges, most of whom are holding or held managerial positions for years.

Elections are associated with renewal and new perspectives, although expectations in this case are unfounded. GYLA believes that this is a rotation of individuals loyal to the clan, where the current judicial members of the council will be replaced by those other judges who are under the control of an influential group.
